In the hotel industry the supply chain vulnerability is the primary issue and therefore the practices of supply chain were focused to influence the competitive advantage through supply chain practices. The study investigates the impact of practices of supply chain in agility, flexibility and responsiveness of supply chain on competitive advantage. The technique of survey approach was used to gather the data from 250 respondents in the hotel industry. SEM Model in Amos v.21 were used to validate the proposed model structural relationships. The results stated that to the supply chain practices and supply chain a competitive advantage, supply chain flexibility, and supply chain responsiveness tended to be more important than supply chain agility. In the final section, the implication and discussions were followed by the future research directions.
